

Hong Kong students' competitiveness

Bernard Chan

The world is a circle that never begins and nobody knows where the circle ends. For the new generation in China and Hong Kong, the leading position has started to reverse. Who leads? When Hong Kong students are still dreaming about themselves as the elite groups, Bernard Chan has given a very useful reminder to our students. He pointed that students in mainland China are fast catching up in the brave new world of reform and work. Therefore, Hong Kong students should have been busy sustaining their quality and competitiveness by having a correct attitude. Recently, employers complained that many graduates seeking employment could not write well or could not meet their requirement. Hong Kong students should not just blame the economic meltdown if they cannot find a job. Whatever the situation, they have to be humble to keep improving themselves. Reading, engaging in voluntary work and exposing themselves to the society are the effective ways to broaden their horizons. Students who attended this talk surely benefited from Mr. Chan's words. His words are perhaps the best and loving reminders for the 21st Hong Kong youth.
